My first experience in clay came when taking a class from Neil Moss at El Camino College. It didn't take long to realize I would continue to work with clay throughout my life. That has been true since then, including opportunities to teach at local schools and as an instructor at community art centers and Flathead Valley Community College.

At the end of 1997, I began work at Whitefish Pottery as their production potter, throwing commercial utilitarian ware. I worked there from October 1997 to August, 2000. This improved my throwing skills and at the same time made me very tired of both perfectly round pottery and repetition. Subsequently, I saw a rapid growth and change in my own work. While at Whitefish Pottery, I helped build an anagram kiln and continue to participate in its annual firing.

In November 2000 I bought a house and pottery in Kalispell. The pottery has a 30 cu. ft. Bourry box wood kiln, a 36 cu. ft. sprung arch gas kiln and a now, a raku kiln. I was part of the firing team for this wood kiln for 3 years prior to my buying the place. I have had to rebuilt it numerous times due to flaws in the design. I am very excited about the prospect of firing my wood kiln again, I was hoping to fire it Fall of 2019, but due to winter coming very early, it will have to wait till Spring of 2020!

Currently, I make altered functional ware from porcelain and white stoneware. I create my pieces by first throwing a form on the potter's wheel, then altering and shaping it, folding and cutting it, while the clay when still pliable. I offer individual and small group lessons and workshops, as well as selling my ware out of my studio and through galleries.
