

Artist statement.

As a child of a Holocaust survivor, through my father's stories heard since early childhood, I developed a particular perspective on life. One of the great driving forces in my work is aligning myself with the underprivileged, drawing a straight comparison between the persecution of the Jews and present-day oppression of people of color, gender discrimination and discrimination of any other minority group. I feel great empathy with victims of war conflicts and cannot stomach war rhetoric. The growing bigotry and racism across large populations is infuriating. When making art, these thoughts and feeling are always present. They may express themselves through brutal treatment of materials, fragmentation of the human form, or obvious deletions or obfuscation of meaning.

Since 2017 through 2019 I worked on relief paintings and sculptures. I made them of cement, plaster, found objects, foam, sand, tar, glass beads, etc. In one way or another they always spoke of a trauma, either human, or one brought on nature.

In 2019, after returning from an artist residency in Berlin, I became involved again with painting, working mostly large scale. I often start with something I see on the news, or something I read. I have made several paintings based on news photographs from the civil war in Syria, or images taken from the battlefields of WWI. When finished with a piece, I almost immediately detach from it, and begin a process of forming ideas and collecting materials for the next one. And the new work is always a response to the one just made. They follow one another like chain links. I am interested foremost in making, and not knowing the destination fuels my interest in what is to come.
