Teaching Philosophy

Today's diverse community of students require multifaceted and engaging learning experiences and empathetic pathways. The university harbors an environment that integrates cultures, social awareness and emotional intelligence which prepares students to become the professionals of the future.

Implementing a liberal arts education allows for the promotion of aesthetic, critical, analytical and evaluative thinking for the development of artistic understanding, awareness and independence. Students in the arts learn to participate and create language in materiality, processes and the construction of meaning. The classroom becomes a marketplace for the promotion, creation and exchange of information. It is my goal as an instructor in the arts to foster learning through experience, experimentation and critical inquiry within a safe environment.

Focusing on the interaction of content, media and research is an important aspect in my teaching and classroom methodology. These aspects are not only interchangeable, they have the ability to work together to inform and influence the molding of new ideas. The building of technical and contextual skills are imperative for the investigation of ideas and the creation of art. Teaching communication of visual viewpoints through the use of materials, media and in-depth techniques is critical for the reinforcement of content and empowers the student to speak in a range of voices.

In order to reach a diverse range of students and accommodate an equally diverse range of learning styles, I utilize various methods that involve discussion, writing, studio practice, group and individual work in conjunction with each other in order to approach learning from all angles. Understanding comes through application, research, presentations, critiques, gallery visits, artist lectures, interdisciplinary and real world engagements. In addition, teaching an understanding of the proper use and application of tools creates a safer workplace. Building a classroom that is open to a diversity of students and opinions is imperative to adding to the richness of the classroom experience.

Linking historical and contemporary art criticism to inquiry and process allows for a better understanding of the direction a student's art is taking. Instructing students in connecting their ideas to social currents provides experience with art as fundamentally related to ideology and society. The application of aesthetics and criticism promotes the analysis of the art itself. I believe classes and lessons should be used to further visual language through artistic practice and content building.

However, without passion, the very best educational philosophy would not benefit students at all. It is my goal to be able to continue my love of teaching visual studies in a welcoming, diverse environment that fosters higher education and understanding of contemporary practices and experiences in the arts. Whether preparing students to follow their dreams, enter the workforce or continue on to further learning and professional practice, it is my responsibility to be at the forefront of education and visual arts in order to best guide our student learners who are tomorrow's leaders while remaining a passionate and productive artist as well as an educator.

Multicultural Practice

Perception of reality is dependent on time, place and history, therefore it is socially and culturally constructed. Consequently, art is influenced by and reflective of the society that creates it. Visual art is a language that speaks to individuals, communities and societies. It speaks of a vast array of ideas such as beliefs, identities and causes. Art is a forum that connects cultures and creates communities. The classroom is one such community composed of individuals with diverse backgrounds and goals. Speaking through visual language allows the educator to reach students in a forum that fosters personal development and discovery through understanding and artistic application.

My work as a director, instructor and coordinator has brought me in contact with students of many ages and backgrounds. I have taught and interacted with learners from diverse cultures ranging from rural ranching communities to urban bilingual classrooms in both public and private systems. Experience and education has shown me that the integration of numerous modes of teaching is imperative to creating a well-rounded practice that is best able to reach the diverse populations of learners.

Contrasting opinions and viewpoints add to the richness and depth of scholarship as well as a more exciting and vibrant classroom experience. Fostering a framework that promotes mutual respect of one another is imperative to creating a successful learning community equipped to share and discuss critical thought.

Collaboration between colleagues within and outside of the visual arts allows for interdisciplinary engagements which expand the students learning horizon. Creating numerous pathways of inquiry aids students in their personal development and educational growth. Teaching practice that shows students how to give back to their community and environment is also crucial. This molds artists who are socially aware of and accountable to their connection to place and society.

Visual art and culture has the ability to reach out and pull people together. It is a tool to cross boundaries: culture, needs, personality, age, ideology, interest, society, identity and values. As an educator within the arts it is my responsibility to promote empathy, individual expression, social justice and responsibility. I will always strive to find new ways to reach all of my students and aid them on their path both to independence and service.

Artist Statement

ANNA K. LEMNITZER

In my artistic practice, the content dictates the materials and methods necessary for the formulation of an idea. The approaches I use include performance, video and installation, all of which ride the backbone of drawing and traditional applications.

Melding content and method through traditional and new genres approaches, my work often examines perceptions of “self” and “psyche”. These explorations often reference an individual’s domestic and very intimate spaces (including the body), which allows for a physical awareness, appreciation and understanding of another’s personality and psychological characteristics.

Dave Hickey, from Enter the Dragon: On the Vernacular of Beauty, quotes Baudelaire as saying “the beautiful is always strange,” by which he means, that it is always strangely familiar.

Scholarly Performance Agenda

Areas of Inquiry:

- Symbols in art and culture
- Personality and Identity/Alter/Dissociation
- Immortality
- Distortion of time
- Simulacrum/Ideas of perfection
- Association and understanding of meaning
- Empathy

Applications:

- Digital Applications
- Traditional Drawing applications
- Traditional Watercolor applications
- Blending of imagery via digital elements and traditional techniques
- Mixed Media Assemblage

Series Work:

Immortality/Alter Egos

2012 - Current

- Use of watercolor, graphite and digital editing
- Series of large-scale pieces based upon research of alter egos
- Applications for solo exhibition and possible publications

"Personality is the mask or appearance one presents to the world," Carl Jung. In dissociation, a person behaves and perhaps slightly "appears" as they normally would not. The "alter" will always have aspects of the original. Examples of things that change: age, sex, race, posture, gesture and speech.

Scraping/Obsession Series

- 2013 - Current
- Use of the body and materials that create mark
- Created for exhibition
- Ritualistic series of video performances serves as my examination of the body as object, extension and reflection of society, and layer/symbol of the internal self.

Drawing Memories:

- 2014 - Current
- Created for installation/exhibition
- Use of drawing, watercolor, projection and manipulated found objects
- Installation format to elicit nostalgic and aesthetic responses. Focus on form, lines, movement and simple colors.

Arts Educational Research:

Creating Empathy Through Visual Metaphors

2015 - Current

- Use of research in empathy, disorders, materiality
- Presentation to educators, students, etc. in classroom and online
- Promoting understanding of and how to employ empathy in the classroom for a more inclusive environment, self awareness and understanding of materials and processes.
