

The Realm of “Daily Bread”

DRAWINGS & COLLAGES

SALAMANDRA
<http://lisasalamandra.com>

Le realm of “Daily Bread” began one day in 2001, when I decided to recover the paper which was wrapped around my daily bread, after its purchase in the bakery of my village in central France, and use it as the surface of my drawings. Through various water-based mediums (ink, gouache...) and collage, I transform these papers into works of art.

The serial evolution of “Daily Bread” has led to the creation of several “sub-series” or derivatives—each representing a vein of visual research.

Today, the mother series “Daily Bread” and its different sub-series count more than 350 finished works, and roughly 100 in progress.

The pages which follow feature key dates of the series’ evolution, followed by chosen pieces.

The Birth of "Daily Bread"

I recover this frail paper after the purchase of my baguette in the bakery of my village in central France and use it as the surface of my drawings. I draw and paint on this paper, and collage in using elements that are taken directly from my daily life.

2006

Advent of the First Sub-Series: "Love Notes"

I integrate the "love notes" written to me by my husband into the drawings of "Daily Bread." These notes—tender, caustic, mean, ironic, humorous—allow me to speak about another facet of my daily life: my couple's intimate one.

2006

"Poilâne by Salamandra"

At the invitation of Apollonia Poilâne, CEO of La Maison Poilâne, I transform the bread sacks of her world-famous bakery into works of art, thus creating the "série Poilâne." I transfer the language of "Daily Bread" onto this series. In 2008, a portion of my production was acquired by La Maison Poilâne for their corporate art collection.

2008

The Sensational Entry of Raw Meat Advertisement Imagery: Birth of the Sub-Series "Raw Meat"

In "Daily Bread," I began, for the first time, to use the raw meat supermarket advertisement imagery as an element of collage—most frequently to construct the female body. I explore here primarily the stereotypical image of women, in reincarnating feminine matrixes (after the pin-up, master paintings, and the live model).

2011-18

Collages without Backgrounds: The Raw Meat triptych

For seven years, I reinterpreted a monumental triptych of female figures, modeled after Francis Bacon's triptych, exclusively with supermarket advertisement imagery. I created, for the first time, collages without backgrounds—meaning the collage material (the pieces of advertisement imagery) have been glued one atop of the other—the figure has thus fused with its surface.

Birth of the Sub-Series “CUT-OUTS”

The triptych Raw Meat brought about an evolution in my collage process which I put into play in “CUT-OUTS”: here, I cut up the papers which once wrapped my daily bread into pieces and I glue these pieces together to create new images. I don’t use any paint or drawing mediums; on the contrary, I choose to solely use the printed motifs and words of the papers to elaborate my collages. I create studies that precede the realization of monumental collages in order to test out this new process. When the theme calls for it, other “traces” gleaned from my daily life also become collage material.

2025

Birth of a sub-series of “CUT-OUTS”: “A Coat of Arms of One’s Own”

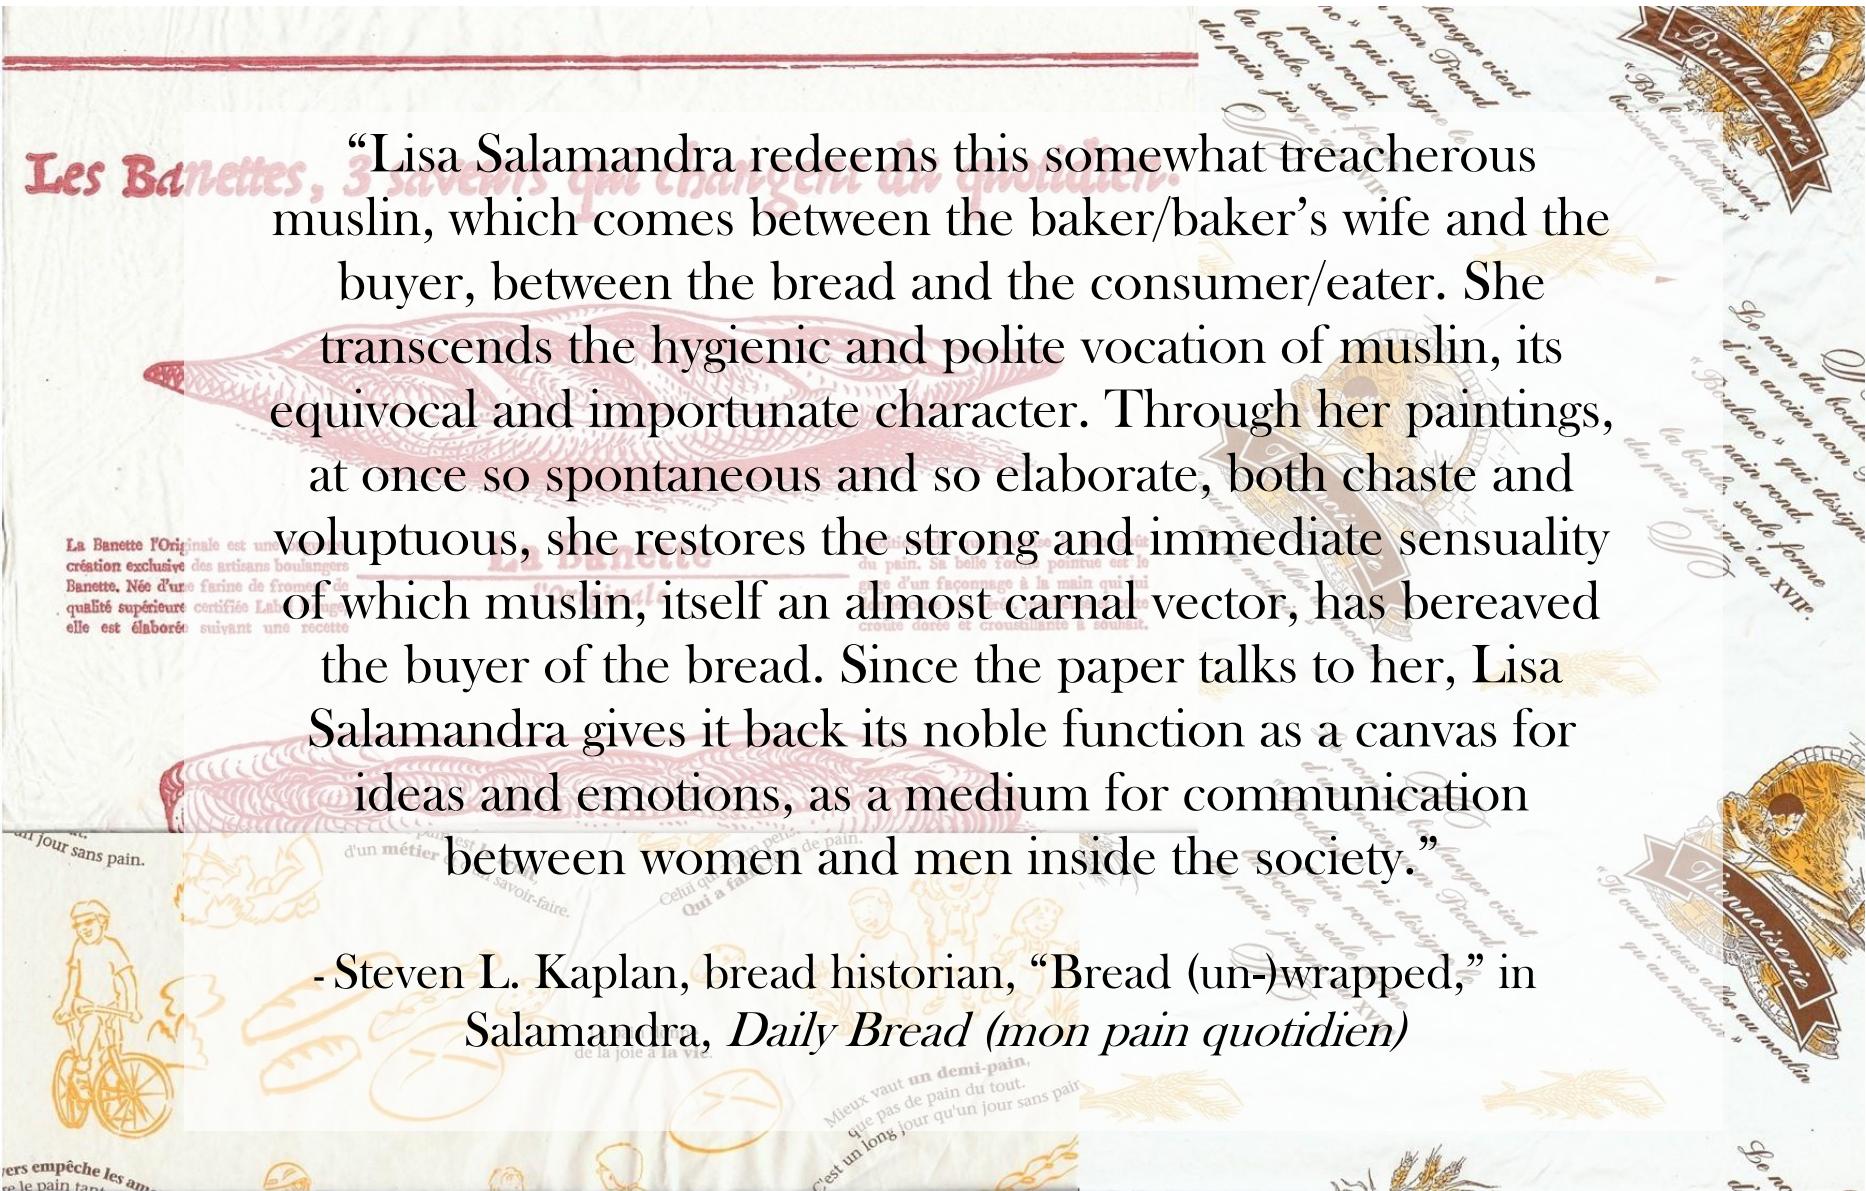

The idea for this series arose from my reinterpretation of the fourth panel of Hans Memling’s polyptych titled Coat of Arm’s. In my coat of arms, my collage replaces Memling’s dragon with a salamander, a symbol I associate with my family’s name. Thereafter I decided I will create, through collage, a coat of arms for others—either at their request or on my own. My works will reactivate and personalize this medieval symbolism, inherited and static. Their coats of arms will incorporate the symbols they have chosen, associated with their lives and beings. Thus, a form of collaboration is born in the series “Daily Bread.” The coats of arms for women will have a particular meaning: indeed, in the Middle Ages, women had their own coats of arms, made up of, on one side, their father’s arms and, on the other, their husband’s. My works will thus emancipate this symbol from its fundamentally patriarchal dimension.

2025

Birth of the sub-series “Contemporary Calligrams”

The calligramme, invented by Guillaume Apollinaire, consists of arranging the text of a poem in such a way as to form a figure. My “contemporary calligram” is inspired by this process, creating a purely visual (illegible) figure from the letters of one or several words. Roland Barthes speaks about “a book [which] is therefore useful, [and] teaches us to distance ourselves from its simple reading, giving us the idea of seeing in the letter, like the ancient calligraphers, the enigmatic projection of our own body.”

The first work, titled WANT, from my “Manifesto-Painting” series, stemmed from this visual research of the “contemporary calligram”; this idea will be fully developed in the drawings and collages of this forthcoming sub-series of “Daily Bread.”

Les Banettes, “Lisa Salamandra redeems this somewhat treacherous muslin, which comes between the baker/baker’s wife and the buyer, between the bread and the consumer/eater. She transcends the hygienic and polite vocation of muslin, its equivocal and importunate character. Through her paintings, at once so spontaneous and so elaborate, both chaste and voluptuous, she restores the strong and immediate sensuality of which muslin, itself an almost carnal vector, has bereaved the buyer of the bread. Since the paper talks to her, Lisa Salamandra gives it back its noble function as a canvas for ideas and emotions, as a medium for communication between women and men inside the society.”

This Is My Life is a monumental collage nearly solely composed of all kinds of elements which I carefully ‘collected’ over the past 25 years of my life. Although these papers might seem insignificant, they represent direct traces of my lived existence, they are the vestiges of my daily acts. This Is My Life can thus be viewed as a giant scrapbook; the work shows how these little pieces of paper—receipts, tickets, scribbles, notes, lists...—that one receives or creates (indeed less and less, as our daily acts become more and more dematerialized) can bear memory—glimpses of one’s life.
