Linda Warren Projects is pleased to present our winter solo exhibitions: Paula Henderson’s “…Looking for You in the Mirror...” and Megan Euker’s “The Richard Project: Beginning to End.” For both of these gallery artists, the figure provides primary artistic motivation, but in vastly differing ways. Henderson examines the idealized female form to generate dialogue about desire, beauty and our social landscape. For Euker, a single male subject has inspired an extensive, two-year investigation into the figure, the discipline of studio practice and the integration of old and new media.

In her fifth solo show at the gallery, Chicago artist Paula Henderson exhibits a 43-foot custom wallpaper installation and a series of two-dimensional works addressing multiple issues that are intertwined in our social fabric. Looking for You in the Mirror, the series that prompted the exhibition’s title, is centered on fashion media, and the troubling influence it wields over female self-image. In works like Appearances I, Henderson traces her central figure from fashion magazine ads, then manipulates and mirrors the forms, exaggerating their symmetry and creating multiple limbs – also a reference to Eastern deities and Bodhisattvas charged with guiding souls to perfection. Seemingly nude (as clothing fuses with form) and seemingly faceless (save for her pouty lips), Henderson’s “goddess” speaks to a commercialized female representation, and the power it has to distract from and distort human potential.

An offshoot of Looking for You in the Mirror, Henderson’s Traffic Pattern series takes formal cues from the symmetrical leg schemes of her “goddesses.” Isolated and repeated, the legs featured in works like Traffic I are transformed into what the artist refers to as “a map or codex of a sexualized site.” Here, Henderson renders the legs removed from the body, and the male figures flattened, stylized and anonymous, reinforcing the removal of humanity in this complex pattern of sexual exploitation. In Henderson’s series Groundwork, the artist delves into her longtime pursuits of formalist abstraction. In these works, Henderson’s predilection for pattern is manifested in all-over compositions, intermingling ambiguous forms with recognizable markings, like the tread of a shoe, to create complex schematics that encourage reflection beyond the ordinary function of such social signifiers.

While Henderson’s practice leans toward multitudinous contents and narratives, Chicago-based artist Megan Euker undertakes a singular thesis, examined and reexamined to an ultimate degree. Euker, who also trains in the sport of boxing, looks to a quote by Bruce Lee, often referenced by her coach: “I fear not the man who has practiced 10,000 kicks once, but I fear the man who has practiced one kick 10,000 times.” Applied to her art practice, Euker has set forth to master a single, three-dimensional, figurative subject: a man named Richard. Neither a close friend nor a complete stranger, Euker’s colleague is invariably depicted in the same, slouching, anti-heroic pose.

The artist first 3D scanned Richard in January of 2013, and has since repeatedly recreated his form, primarily in CNC milled wood. Despite the technology’s potential for absolute precision, in actuality, glitches and inconsistencies regularly occur. For Euker, the flaws of this continually evolving technique provide a wealth of artistic inspiration. Euker’s fourth solo exhibition with the gallery, “The Richard Project: Beginning to End” features “Richard” in large scale and in miniature, as a bust, as a cross section, milled from butcher block, and carved into hardwood. Not only an intensive illustration of studio rigor, Euker’s oeuvre is also a contemporary take on the history of figurative realism, and a masterful example of the vernacular and the ordinary made elegant and sublime.
