Four painters, who paint for the world to watch, are on display at Linda Warren Gallery. Jeremy Long's large-scale narrative paintings have a close relationship to historical Neo-Classical paintings courtesy of the size, tight edge line, and dramatized scene. Don Southard keeps his observation pieces fresh by painting small close-ups. Stanley Luis' cropped narrative street scene with a Monet-inspired palette gives a sharp contrast to the image you would expect to see in the Ashcan School of painting with muddy gray colors. Luis has painted what the Ashcan school rebelled against: American Impressionism. Collage canvas pieces under one of Stanley Luis' oil paintings add a textured emphasis in the painting. Painters Painting definitely is an exhibition which takes some time to discover the combined traditional painting techniques used by each artist.

Insider Info: In the project space Megan Euker is exhibiting juicy paintings of bathers and boldly painted Brazilian martial arts that she witnessed while she was a Fulbright scholar in Florence, Italy--an unexpected subject matter for the region. Euker's paintings were painted in multiple flesh tones with bold thick brushstrokes to activate the energy of the subject matter, leaving the viewer a lot of time to absorb the quick moment captured.
