Bio

Gunjan Kumar is an artist based in Chicago originally from India. She has spent many years traveling through interiors of India and other countries in southeast Asia, observing age-old practices in art, visiting archaeological sites, observing prehistoric paintings and other tribal arts. These experiences form the undertone of her art practice. Her process involves ground earth and minerals like shell oysters, clay, calcium carbonate etc. used as core mediums applied on natural surfaces using techniques inspired by traditional methods.

Her works have been exhibited at the Ukrainian Institute of Modern Art, the Donnelley Foundation, Chicago Artist Coalition, Chicago Sculpture International Biennial, among others. She is represented by Gallery Exhibit 320, New Delhi. In 2020, Kumar started an education program called Nature Studies, with two workshops on working with nature as a medium in arts. The workshops have been held at the Chicago Art Department, Design Museum of Chicago, Ukrainian Institute of Modern Art, Chicago, Pulitzer Art Foundation, St. Louise among others and have had an ongoing reach.

Kumar is a graduate in textiles from National Institute of Design and Technology, New Delhi. Kumar is currently working on a project with an American Pakistani artist Mahwish Chishty curated by Dr. Lise McKean, that presents their responses to exploration of archaeological sites and artifacts in the Sindhu (Indus) watershed, a geographical region extending across northwest India and much of Pakistan. This project will premiere as a Two-person show at the South Asia Institute, Chicago in May 2021 before it travels to be exhibited in New Delhi, India and Lahore, Pakistan in the later part of 2021.
